

2014 Extractive Industry and Sustainable Development Executive Training Program (June 9-20, 2014)

Investments in the extractive industry have the potential to play a vital role in the economic growth of resource-rich developing countries, but have often been plagued with corruption, environmental and social degradation.

Who Participates:

The program is targeted towards public sector officials, civil-society representatives and select private sector participants

Participants will be equipped with skills to ensure responsible development of the extractive sector in their country.

This second annual training program is a joint effort by the Vale Columbia Center on Sustainable International Investment and the Center on Globalization and Sustainable Development.

Practitioners and experts in the field will facilitate real case studies and participants will have a understanding of the framework required for sustainable development of extractive industries.

Participants will also have access to a Wiki webpage that will contain relevant readings, speaker presentations and a platform to facilitate discussion amongst participants and speakers.
